"I am here to confer with Professor W. L. McLaughlin of the state experimental station about the drainage investigations which the department of agriculture has undertaken in Utah," said, Mr. Mead. "During the past two months Mr. Elliott, the drainage expert of our office, and Professor McLaughlin have been studying the localities where drainage is needed.

"Wherever irrigation is practiced a long time the investigator will find the district divided into three zones. The first zone, comprising the highest land, will not need drainage because the surplus water is all carried off in the subsoil. In the next or middle zone there will be places where there is too much water, due to sub-soil water coming down from the zone above. There is water, due to sub-soil water coming down from the zone above.
